

To Whom It May Concern,

I would like to apply for the role of School Data Protection Consultant.

As someone who will be graduating from Law at the University of Warwick later this year, I am keen to enter the workplace with a job I feel excited about. Data protection is something that has always intrigued me, as I see it as something which affects everybody, yet is not often given more than a second thought when one clicks "I accept cookies" on a website. Being in my final year at university, I have opted to write a dissertation, and my topic is about privacy. However this dissertation, and my studies so far, have been almost exclusively theoretical in nature, and so I would love the opportunity to put what I have learnt into practice and see its practical applications.

Being a UniversityGO! Mentor, I have had the opportunity to mentor children in foster care. Developing close relationships with them, I became aware how vulnerable children from these backgrounds are. However my work as a Think Higher ambassador also sees me working with other schoolchildren as well, and it is through these jobs that I have realised how a data breach can have serious consequences. Working with schools to bolster their data protection practices, this job combines two things that I feel strongly about: protecting one's privacy and protecting children.

Whilst I do not have any formal industry experience in teaching or data protection, I have a strong theoretical foundation which can help inform the practical learning, and I have a desire to begin my professional career doing something I will enjoy. I am confident that Data Protection Education can provide me with this enjoyment, and in return I know I can give enthusiasm, an eagerness to learn new things, and satisfied customers.

Thank you for taking time to read my application; I look forward to hearing from you.

Yours Sincerely,

Taylor Tumbridge
