Hi both,

Following my visit last week, I have spoken to Arrienne about the large photos and canvases and she has advised the following:

There is an exemption for photos that our schools sometimes apply and that's one for historical and archiving purposes. If they are old photos but demonstrate something relevant or timely for the school or if they simply want to actually keep the photos then they can do so using this exemption. Additionally, if students do come forward they could always take their request into account at that time.

I would also recommend they consider removing them at some point, if not financially viable now.

We've just updated our photo and video guidance so it might be worth viewing that as we would now recommend using a waiver for big expensive things such as this so it avoids this issue in the future.

School Captains- a bit more difficult as you could argue it's a task in the public interest because it's about progress and achievement at the end of the day. However, I also like to think about where it's displayed. If the public can see it then I would recommend moving it elsewhere and no consent needed but still recommend just first name where possible. If they want to keep it public facing then it's not about education, it's about marketing really so then get consent.

I hope that helps,

Many thanks,

Tammy Buchanan
