Hi Caroline,

Thank you for your email. Regard the therapist, if they collect any data directly from the parent, then they are the data controller. If you are not sharing any personal data with a third party then there is no need to complete a due diligence form. I am hoping to be able to write some further guidance over half term.

Same applies to the sports club.

However, if these clubs are run on your premises, you need to consider what data of yours they have access to such as open offices, open rooms, information on walls etc. which increases the risk of a data breach or data inadvertently shared.

I hope that helps,

Many thanks,
Tammy

Can you advise please:

Rachel Henderson is a play therapist that comes in.

All we tell her is the name of the child, then the parent takes over with any other information.

Do we need to do anything with her? you were going to see if the Due Dilligence form was sufficient.

Same goes for Sportacus which is a sports company that runs clubs - the parents book this themselves, we share nothing else.

Thanks.

Hi Caroline,

I hope you had a good half term. I spoke to someone in our legal team about this and they advised that you should add them onto the Knowledge Bank as a third party. They should also be listed on your privacy policy. They also asked if there are appropriate contracts and data sharing agreements in place for the protection of the data - are you able to send us a copy of the contract and we can have a look for you?

Many thanks,
Tammy

Hi Tammy

We have a self employed play therapist comes in regularly that works with some of our children and then she sends us invoices.

The only information she is given is their names.

Does she need a privacy notice or just the due diligence form?
